THE HYENA AND THE SQUIRREL.

A long time ago, Hyena and Squirrel were great friends and lived in the same homestead. They were wealthy. They had many" goats, cattle, and sheep! Both of them were herdsmen, and took great care of their animals. They grazed them in turn; the Hyena would be in the homestead looking after domestic affairs for so many days, while the squirrel grazed the animals for so many days. One day the hyena began to plan how he might kill the squirrel and own all the animals. Often when they were in the field together grazing their animals he would suggest to the squirrel that they should go for a swim in the river. He always hoped to drown the squirrel. Realizing this, the squirrel always avoided swimming near him. The hyena tried all sorts of tricks, but his friend was too smart to fall into any of his traps. When the squirrel realized that the hyena really meant to kill him, he decided to retaliate. One day, the hyena was in the field grazing their animals, while the squirrel was left to do the housework and cook. Squirrel cooked a very nice dish of meat, and the fragrant delicious food could be smelled from afar. He also burnt a small stone red-hot, which he wanted to use to kill the hyena. At sunset, when the herdsmen returned their animals to their homesteads, the squirrel was expecting his friend to bring back their animals and put them in the sheds. Usually the hyena was very hungry at the end of a day's work, and he ate gluttonously whatever he was given. He would complain bitterly if the food was not ready for him when he returned. Now one could hear the bells of the bulls and goats coming nearer and nearer. The hyena was coming home, very hungry as usual. When he was only a few yards away, the cunning squirrel rolled the red-hot stone in meat and fat, and made a nice roll of delicious meat around it. It looked like a kind of meat ball, and its fragrance made the hyena's mouth water. The hot stone was burning the meat and fat and it produced such a smell that one could smell it from a long way. At the gate of the homestead, the hyena shouted and asked if there was something "nice for him to eat. He said that he was-very hungry and threatened to eat the squirrel if there-was not enough food for him. This did not worry the squirrel. He called out that he had-cooked a special food that evening and the hyena would be sure to enjoy it. But this assurance did not seem to please the hyena, who was more interested in killing the squirrel than in having nice food. He advanced towards the squirrel very angrily, until he said to him, "Eh my dear friend Hyena, look! I have very special and nice food for you. Can't you smell it?" "Yes," replied the hyena, "I can smell it but is it enough?-I- am tired and hungry after spending the whole day looking after these animals of yours. If there isn't enough food, I shall have to eat you for supper tonight." "Oh, no, my friend hyena," replied the squirrel, "there is more food than you can eat." And at this point he picked up the roll of meat with the red-hot stone inside and said, "Open your mouth my friend hyena, and taste the special piece of meat. Swallow it at once while I serve you an even larger dish of meat."

The hyena opened his mouth without hesitation or suspicion, and the squirrel threw the roll of meat right into his mouth. As it was too small to chew, he swallowed it at once. It was delicious and tasty as it went down, but a few seconds after he had swallowed it, the red-hot stone produced so much heat in the hyena's stomach that it killed him instantly. So, the squirrel was left in peace. He acquired all the animals and all the land, and lived happily thereafter.
